may be less and also to put the enterprise on the plane of the designs of Great Britain and France.

It is well known that the National Geographic Society is interested generally in the enterprise, but it has not yet formally taken any action. It is not a government body, and it will possibly yield its claims to the Smithsonian Institution, which is the government body which undertakes expeditions such as the one now being conducted in Africa by former President Rooseveit.

Roosevelt.
All of the plans seem to contemplate the use of the Roosevelt Peary's ship. If naval stips should be utilized for the search for the Antarctic Pole it is within the possibilities that Commander Peary might be induced to go along with the expedition. He is soon to be retired with an honorary title, in addition to that of captain in the navy. He has expressed himself as in in sympathy with the quest for the other pole.

in sympathy with the quest for the other pole.

If Congress should within a short time authorize an "American National Expedition to the South Pole," the expedition could start within a very short period. Two naval ships and the Roosevelt would make an ideal squadron, say officials, and it is not improbable that to the navy creas would be ron, say officials, and it is not improbable that to the navy crews would be added the men who with Peary became accustrated to the rigors of the under-zero climate.

The curious comment was made here to-day that if President Roosevelt came home suddenly he might be in the humor to head the South Pole expedition, himself pedition himself.

Pole.

[Special to The Times-Dispatch.] Washington, D. C.. January 8.—The Smithsonian Institution has become interested in the quest of the South Pole. It is said that it is formulating a proposition to submit to Congress for coperation between the institution and the Navy Department by which two ships of the navy shall be detailed for the international race to the Antarctic Pole.

The object of inviting the co-operation of the may is that the expense may be less and also to put the enterprise on the plane of the designs of the company of the company is certainly one of the play and of the company is certainly one of the most powerful plays of the day, and the company is certainly one of the most powerful plays of the day, and the company is certainly one of the best that has been in Richmond in a long time.

It would be hard to imagine more thoroughly perfect work than that of Thomas Coffin Cooke as Joseph Brooks; he made that wretched, miserable, caddish part so detectably live and realthat one quite forgot that the man was acting a part and reading lines that were written by somebody elsehe simply was the man Brooks, mean and hideous of soul and heart. Frank C. Burton, as Captain Williams, played the strong, coarse extrador in a compelling manner, altogsther convincingly. Edna Brothers was good as the sweet, brave wife of the wretched Brooks. The minor parts were well played, more than well played, but the work of Cooke "stands out," and in a company of a very high class.
